MONTHLY COMMENTARY

Our benchmark, the FTSE EPRA/NAREIT Developed Net Rental Index, recorded a total USD return of -23.04% in March, with our underlying UCITS Fund outperforming this benchmark by 5.10% for the month. The best performing listed real estate market was Hong Kong, which recorded a total USD return of -7.95% for the month, while Australia recorded the lowest total USD return of -42.05%.

Best performing Global Real Estate sectors for the month:

Data Centers & Towers: Sectors with secular demand tailwinds, which have not been derailed by the weaker economic outlook. In fact, with working from home and social distancing in force, there is increased consumption, transfer and storage of data, which benefits these sectors. We have been overweight these sectors on the back of their structural multi-year growth, which has contributed positively to the current month's performance.

Self Storage: The sector has benefitted from the fact that demand for personal storage space tends to benefit from life events (e.g. moving home, death, divorce etc). As such, the sector has held up well during this period of deteriorating economic outlook. We are marginally overweight the sector: underweight in the US on the back of supply concerns, but overweight in Europe, which has contributed positively to the current month's performance.

Industrial: The sector has strong tailwinds driven by supply chain reconfiguration, to fulfil ecommerce. Furthermore, this pandemic has filtered even more spend into online channels and will likely continue to do so beyond the end of COVID-19. We have been overweight the sector on these structural tailwinds, which has positively contributed to performance this month.

Worst performing Global Real Estate sectors for the month:

Malls: In a sector already facing structural headwinds as general spend shifts away from physical malls into online channels, the impact of people not going into public spaces and not spending in these malls during COVID-19, has just exacerbated the problem. When coupled with (certain stocks) having weaker balance sheets, this is a sector that could come under even further pressure. We have been underweight retail on the back of these structural issues, which has benefitted the current month's performance.

Hotels: Another sector that was already experiencing weak fundamentals, due to elevated supply and weak demand, weakened even further by alternative forms of accommodation such as Airbnb. COVID-19 has impacted this already fragile sector most severely, as bookings have all but evaporated for the foreseeable future. We were underweight this sector based on the weak fundamentals, which has benefitted the current month's performance.

Net Lease: A usually defensive sector, which has been hard hit by COVID-19. While this sector would traditionally be considered a relatively defensive sector due to its long lease length and diversified tenant base, in the current market environment where there is a risk of broad based tenant default, these long term leases have been discounted by the market. Furthermore, there has been concern over the underlying tenant base, which is generally comprised of retail (structural issues already discussed) and gaming companies, which themselves have performed poorly in the current environment as casinos have shut down. We have been underweight the sector on the back of these structural concerns, which has benefitted the current month's performance.

Student Housing: This is a sector that has traditionally held up well in economic downturns, as tertiary education is less economically sensitive than many other sectors. However, this sector has performed poorly over the past month due to COVID-19. The reason being, many universities have shut down, and students forced to vacate the premises – something that does not happen under a “normal” economic downturn. This brings into question the collectability of rents for the current semester and brings uncertainty as to what bookings will do for the next semester, starting 2H20. We have been marginally overweight the sector, which has detracted from the current month's performance. We continue to watch this closely but believe the sector may rebound quickly once we are through COVID-19 and students return to campus.

Within our global real estate universe, we are fortunate to have a diverse set of opportunities across various countries, sectors, and stocks. We believe our robust investment methodology puts us in a good place to continue to find these opportunities and deliver alpha for our clients.
